"The Talk of the Road" is most amusing and strikingly characteristic. Children turn to it with avidity, while the less ardent parent ponders the different expressions of true native feeling these conversations contain, as a pledge that those who give utterance to them will one day rise above dogmatism and oppression, and assert the moral dignity of themselves and their fellows."—Rugby Advertiser, November 5, 1853.

Practical Observations on Scarlatina.

"While strongly reprobating publications which pretend to make every man his own physician—more correctly, his own executioner—we rejoice at the appearance of such practical and popular treatises as that before us. It leads to the intelligent use of the physician, and suggests many plain and practical lessons on the subject of health, which will command themselves to the common sense of the reader. We have not space to analyze its contents. The reader will find in it valuable remarks on the use and abuse of medicine; the utility and importance of dry cupping; the value of galvanism in removing acute pain; the importance of medicated vapour baths; and the absolute necessity of attention to the state of the skin. The author's previous publication on Scarlatina brought under public notice the anti-purgative system of treatment, then so strange to many, and now so extensively adopted. His present little work will, we trust, prove a blessing to many, by its plain and practical advice as to the prevention of disease and preservation of health; as well as its suggestions as to the means best suited to the recovery of so inestimable a blessing. It will be best understood by perusing, reading, and acting on the valuable lessons contained in the publication itself, which can be strongly and conscientiously recommended, as, under God, calculated to be of great value to those who carefully consider and act upon the advice it contains."
